Still business as usual a year later. Will this sexcapade ever come to a climax?

Now getting National news coverage a year later as Congress members to call on the Board of Supervisors to conduct a thorough inquiry into the sheriff's Las Vegas slimey sexcapade's last year while on the county dime to the tune of tens of thousands of dollars...

"The ranch home was fitted with barred windows and furnished sparsely with a couch and TV in the front room and nothing but mattresses on the floors of the bedrooms, according to police.

Inside, there were large boxes of condoms and great quantities of lubricant, "It smelled like urine, it smelled like feces, it smelled like cigarette smoke. It didn't look like a massage parlor. It was very obviously not a massage parlor."

Palms greased! Slap on the wrist, No investigation

When Munks came back from Las Vegas, the sheriff made sure he apologized to each of the five supervisors in private, according to interviews with each supervisor.

The sheriff truly felt terribly for what he had done, law enforcement sources close to Munks told Bay Area News Group. In public, the five supervisors said they disapproved of the sheriff being inside an illegal brothel, regardless of what he did or didn't do there.

Prior to the incident, Munks had donated at least $500 to each supervisor during their most recent campaigns for office.

Even Supervisor Jerry Hill, whose run for state Assembly has since benefited from a $1,000 contribution from Munks and thousands of dollars more gained from a fundraiser held at the sheriff's home, ultimately decided to criticize the sheriff for his mishap in Las Vegas. But he was the most accommodating of all the supervisors.

"Certainly, we can't control what someone does after hours, nor should we, and if it's not using county resources, that is fine," said Hill, whose Assembly campaign has received a gift of $7,200 from Munks' in-laws, wealthy philanthropists Bill and Jean Lane. "Certainly, I think that's where the taxpayers' interest is and the county's interest is."

In fact, the board passed an ordinance in November restricting use of county vehicles outside the state of California without prior permission from the county manager.

The action came after the County Manager's Office reported that county employees had taken county-owned vehicles to Las Vegas and prepared for the race with county dollars — all at a cost of about $14,000.

When what happens in Vegas doesn't stay in Vegas: San Mateo sheriff caught in illegal brothel

SAN MATEO, Calif. — Nearly one year ago, Las Vegas police broke down the door to an illegal brothel, caught San Mateo County Sheriff Greg Munks inside and marched him at gunpoint out of the building and into the street.

Now a Bay Area News Group investigation into what happened that night has prompted the county's two Congress members to call on the Board of Supervisors to conduct a thorough inquiry into the sheriff's alleged misconduct.

"This cries out for a comprehensive external investigation, because the highest law enforcement officer in the county should not be under any suspicion of illegal activity at any time ever," said Rep. Jackie Speier, D-Calif.. "I don't think the public is naive, and I don't think they're stupid.

Added Rep. Anna Eshoo, D-Calif., "The whole element of accountability is missing. People simply don't know what happened that night."

It was shortly after 9:30 p.m. on April 21, 2007, that Munks and his friend, Undersheriff Carlos Bolanos, were detained during the climax of "Operation Dollhouse," a two-year investigation targeting an alleged ring of sex traffickers.

Neither man was arrested, nor were any brothel visitors. The targets of "Operation Dollhouse" were the suspected pimps who allegedly sold sex with women, many of whom police believe were indentured sex slaves.

That night, police arrested six alleged pimps at a half-dozen suspected brothels, detained 25 Asian and Latin American prostitutes and confiscated 3,500 tablets of the drug Ecstasy.

Like other men caught at the brothels that night, the sheriff and the undersheriff were briefly detained, then released.

Munks and Bolanos had traveled to Las Vegas with 54 employees from the Sheriff's Office, Probation Department and District Attorney's Office to run the Baker to Vegas Challenge Cup Relay, a 120-mile footrace that attracts law enforcement from across the West Coast and beyond.

"I believed I was going to a legitimate business — it was not," Munks told reporters three days after the raid. The sheriff called the incident a "personal embarrassment" and insisted he never broke the law. Then he told the press he wouldn't "be answering any more questions or talking about this anymore in the future."

The sheriff has been true to his word. For nearly a year, Munks and Bolanos have refused to comment publicly on anything related to the Las Vegas trip.

Sources have told the San Mateo County Times that Munks and Bolanos spent the weekend at the Mandalay Bay, an opulent resort on the Las Vegas strip with two world-class spas offering more than a dozen types of massages, including in-room service to its guests. Both the sheriff and the undersheriff have refused to confirm where they stayed in Las Vegas.

"I'll let your sheriff and undersheriff answer to questions about how they were found in one of our city's brothels," said Lt. Karen Hughes of the Las Vegas Police Department's vice section. "All I'm telling you is that if you're staying at the Mandalay Bay, that hotel offers a spa that caters to tourists and anyone else."

Las Vegas Boulevard boasts at least 20 legitimate spas offering massage services. From the end of the Strip to the residential area where the two men were detained, there are at least four more legitimate spas that offer massages.

A limo ride in Las Vegas ranges between $50 and $150 per hour, whereas Munks could have gotten a massage at most first-class spas on the strip for well below $150.

Munks and Bolanos ended up that night at a ranch home fitted with barred windows and furnished sparsely with a couch and TV in the front room and nothing but mattresses on the floors of the bedrooms, according to police.

There was no business sign on the outside of the building, which sits two miles off the Strip in a gritty residential neighborhood.

Inside, there were large boxes of condoms and great quantities of lubricant, said Lauren Hermosillo, a social worker with the Salvation Army who assisted the women inside once police arrested the people accused of selling their bodies.

Describing the house, Hermosillo said, "It smelled like urine, it smelled like feces, it smelled like cigarette smoke. It didn't look like a massage parlor. It was very obviously not a massage parlor."

Ten hours before police found Munks in the brothel, at 11:30 a.m., the San Mateo Sheriff's Office had begun the relay race in the desert of Baker. Munks himself was the second of 20 runners, traversing 5.6 miles over a stretch that began with low rolling hills and concluded with a steady downward descent. He likely finished running his part of the race in the mid-afternoon.

Now it was 9:30 p.m. and he and Bolanos — who hadn't run in the race and was outside the building at the time of the SWAT raid, according to Las Vegas police — were standing in a lineup outside a brothel.

The Las Vegas Police Department quickly confirmed that Munks and Bolanos had been detained but provided no further information. Police reports from the raids on the various brothels were sealed by local and federal courts.

Prosecutors have either provided few details regarding the case or simply not returned calls for comment. Attempts to contact the accused pimps through their attorneys were declined.

The Times recently confronted Munks about the incident along with allegations of low morale in his department, but the sheriff dismissed the allegations flatly.

Asked whether he should have been disciplined for violating the department's general orders, Munks said, "I've had a policy in the past of not really discussing that in the press. I made my statement, and I'm going to stick to my statement."

"I didn't break the law," he added. "And that's what I'm sticking to."

Why would Munks have risked his reputation and political future by seeking a massage in a residential neighborhood and walking inside a building that lacked signage or any other accoutrements of a legitimate business?

"I can't speak for what the sheriff was thinking, I just have to stand silent on that," said Lt. Logue of the Las Vegas Police Department. "He was not in his own city, and I don't know if he knows how things work around here."

At the very least, the sheriff now understands something about Las Vegas they don't tell you on television, according to the Las Vegas police Lt. Hughes.

Said the vice detective: "The adage — 'What goes on in Las Vegas stays in Las Vegas' — that isn't necessarily the case."

The incident at the Las Vegas Brothel is bad. The lies after are even worse, but there are many more sinister activities that have occurred in the San Mateo Sheriff's Office. A captain caught stalking a female sergeant and threatening her with the power of his rank if she did not comply is one of them. He should have been arrested, but was demoted two ranks instead. He is now back on track to being promoted back to captain. A deputy had sex with an underage girl in one of the patrol areas. That was covered up, then a couple of months later another deputy arrested the brother of the underage girl. It was a good arrest, but the deputy was forced to make the case go away. The two administrators involved in this cover up was a lieutenant (now a captain) and the same captain caught stalking. Another deputy was caught naked in bed with a 14 year old girl at a youth camp. It was covered up. Munks knew, or should've known about all of these incidents.
